Comments:

Allowing federally regulated banks to continue to practice of forced overdraft protection and fees fosters the same environment that has led us to our current financial dilemma. Banks have long protested that they cannot set up accounts because of technological reasons and that the fees allow them the ability to offer free checking to customers. My thought is that corporations and companies should charge consumers for what they use and not try to foist on unsuspecting people hidden or partially obscured fees or penalties under the justification of providing "better service".
