If consumers are no longer able to float checks prior to a check deposit, then banks need to change how they handle the processing for debit card/check transactions to match. The time a debit card transaction is made should be the deciding factor rather than the bank processing the largest amount first and then "bouncing" the rest of the transactions in order to assess numerous fees against the account. The current process is nothing short of robbery. I can't believe it is legal. The sooner this issue is correct, the better for the American public.
