I have two college-age kids who live with an ATM card in their hand. They check their balances online, as do most young people their age (18-25). They both work part-time while full-time students. They have both learned the HARD way that their banks care more about taking their money than alerting them or preventing them from spending when their accounts are low. Also, they have learned the HARD way that their bank will reorder their transactions and deduct the largest transaction first. How do we expect the next generations to trust in any banks when banks are constantly proving they are just another business out to get everyone's hard-earned money? Our money says "In God We Trust", not "In Our Banks We Trust".
