It should be illegal for the banks to get away with what they charge for overdraft fees. The problem isn't the fees themselves, but the fact that the banks don't post transactions or deposits in the order in which they were made. If a deposit is made on a Thursday and a purchase is made on Monday, the purchase made Monday should not post before the deposit. The banks know this yet will do nothing to make a uniform standard. They know consumers will not make a stink about it since they need a checking account and will charge these excessive fees. Considering the current economic condition, people need to have a correct accounting of their bank accounts and need to have the banks do their part and make things logical.
