Comments:

I'm trying to enter this comment for the third time. I bank with Wells Fargo. If your account enters the negative, and the overdraft fee has not yet been applied, you can go in the branch and pay cash. Supposedly, do this will cause the overdraft fee to be cancelled. However, when you make a cash deposit at Wells Fargo, it shows as pending on your account (even though it's CASH), and you still end up getting the overdraft fee. There is a possibility of getting it waived by a bank manager (which they don't want to tell you), but that is a slim possibility because the bank will tell you that the only person that can waive an overdraft fee is the original person who opened your account, no matter how many years ago that was, or if that person still works for the company. Something needs to be done. Please, please, fix this.
