Comments:

i think that the fees are ridiculous because i have been hit several times for overdraft fees that 1. either did not go through because of a mistake on the merchants part for running the transaction 2. bank of america they debit all transactions according to the amount the largest gets deducted first then chronologically debit it out so i had a case where i had an incorrect amount deducted and i had other transactions pending with enough to cover the money but the incorrect amount sent me into 8 overdraft fees and the kicker is that when they all cleared it was from the original positive balance that was there. being a single parent of a disabled daughter this is heart wrenching and there response is oh well dont do transactions that you cant cover they do not care that it was not my fault. we all need banks to do business but they have become so ridiculous so if its a problem they should not allow the transaction to go through if there is no money to be taking out, but then it would mean that they would make no money;
