A bank should not be permitted to deny service on the basis of reputation risk. Banks are facilitators of the movement of money, and our society has become dependant upon that flow being uninterrupted; if any bank can at any time choose to instead deliberately impede this flow of money by citing "reputation risk", it affects not only the person or entity which in that particular case is trying to access banking services, but also shakes the public faith in the banking system upon which every working citizen relies every day.
