Banks have no right to control how people spend their money. It isn't the bank's money, and banks have been made a necessity to purchase many items. Purity culture is a poison, and this is clearly trying to target sex work. Sex work is one of the few ways disabled people are able to find consistent income. This would also impact artists who create erotic art to pay the bills. It's no coincidence this more heavily impacts self-employed people. This is an attempt to attack people who make a living that doesn't allow a CEO to limit their maximum income (to instead line their own pockets with wages stolen from their employees - who work much harder and are far more competent than any CEO). The many ways this would have rippling effects on various aspects of many people's lives is nothing short of deliberate.

This cannot stand. If banks are to remain a necessary part of everyday life, then they cannot be allowed to be businesses, nor run like one. Every person should have total privacy of what they purchase, and banks should be government-regulated to prevent such gems as the Bush-era financial crisis as well as any sort of limitation on what an individual may seek to purchase.

Banks can either be a public service like the post office, or retired for another system of currency management - always with an option for physical currency.
