Money is meant to be a tool that people can exchange for goods and service. This purpose cannot be maintained if banking orgs. are able to have discretion over what can or cannot be a valid purchase. Such conditions fundamentally undermine the use of money, limit personal freedom, and restrict the monetization of people's honest hard work. The law being proposed here is a strong step in the right direction, and I believe that it is an exceedingly simple choice to pass. Simply put, the less restrictions on what we can buy, the more free speech and spread of ideas can flourish, and only by that can money serve its intended purpose. However, I frankly think this is not a strong enough stance. I believe that an outright ban on banking organizations restricting legal purchases should be acted. I believe the less restriction, the better, and hence as firm a stance as possible should be taken.
