The Board should fully remove Reputation Risk from its consideration. Banks and payment processors deciding what legal goods people can spend their money on is both frustrating and, particularly in the current era, laughable. Institutions being granted more power to punish who they believe to have moral superiority over while, statistically, they and the current ruling class openly engage in corruption, pedophilia, and protecting those who do is far beyond the scope of acceptable. Business at that scale should not be able to discriminate based on their ideology regarding legal uses of their services. Their reputations are far more at risk from who's on their board and what they engage in; not what perfectly legal uses of their services may be.
