Allowing major companies to hide behind reputation risk only allows them to arbitrarily discriminate against protected classes of people and claim that somehow they are the ones being harmed. Credit card companies and banks are preventing people from spending their own money on things that are perfectly legal, all so that they don't have to be associated with groups of people that they find distasteful. The root of this very vague "distaste" is almost always naked prejudice when you examine it. They hate promiscuous women so they prevent you from subscribing to a woman's OnlyFans. They hate queer people so they prevent you from purchasing queer art, claiming that because it is queer it is inherently sexual. They hate people of color so they will prevent you from supporting writers of color talking about their racial trauma under the guise that it is distastefully violent. We cannot allow these massive and at this point unavoidable companies to continue selectively enforcing nonspecific rules to the detriment of marginalized peoples.
