

Dear Chairman Powell,

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on the Federal Reserve's Principles for Climate-Related Financial Risk Management for Large Financial Institutions.

I'm grateful that the Fed's Principles recognize that low- to medium-income households and frontline communities will be at the highest risk from the physical and financial impacts of the climate crisis, and I am looking forward to seeing large financial institutions take meaningful action on protecting their customers and communities.

In order to protect our financial stability from the climate crisis, these guidelines need to be requirements, not recommendations. There are not yet any plans in place to ensure that all financial institutions take meaningful steps toward protecting their stability from climate-related risks. These guidelines seem to be for institutions already working on these issues and exclude major banks and corporations who have refused to take action. These guidelines lack a concrete timeline for banks to follow these guidelines; the science shows that we cannot afford any delays in transitioning to a clean energy economy, and many are already feeling the extreme economic impacts of climate change. I would like to see more specifics on how quickly financial institutions need to implement these changes.

The guidelines need to emphasize the importance of managing transition risk by phasing out funding of fossil fuels and investing in sustainable energy projects, with particular attention to ensuring that new infrastructure and technology is accessible and affordable for all - particularly lower-income, frontline, and BIPOC communities.

I am also concerned that the risk assessment process could cause financial institutions to reduce their investment in the frontline communities hit hardest by the climate crisis. I urge the Federal Reserve to take steps to make sure that these communities are not forgotten, ensuring that climate risk assessments do not lead to divestment from BIPOC communities or any furthering of the inequities of historical redlining by banking and mortgage institutions.

With the ever-present climate crisis, we are facing an unprecedented threat to every aspect of our economy and our very lives. The Federal Reserve needs to take bolder action to fulfill their mandate of protecting the stability of our financial system. The Federal Reserve needs to move beyond suggestions and recommendations, and needs to put firm requirements into place for financial institutions of all sizes with the rapid timelines we need to address the climate crisis.

Sincerely,

Francesca Castelli

Dear Chairman Powell,

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on the Federal Reserve's Principles for Climate-Related Financial Risk Management for Large Financial Institutions.

Far from being a political issue, the warming average global temperature is a grave and growing financial threat as climate action has been delayed. I'm grateful that the Fed's Principles recognize that low- to medium-income households and frontline communities will be at the highest risk from the physical and financial impacts of the climate crisis. Households at every income level will be at risk. I am looking forward to seeing financial institutions of all sizes take meaningful action on protecting their customers and communities.

The impacts we are seeing currently from the changing climate are evidence enough that there is every likelihood that financial trauma will occur unless institutions are compelled to adhere to certain standards and reporting processes. In order to protect our financial stability from the climate crisis, these guidelines need to be requirements, not recommendations. There are not yet any plans in place to ensure that all financial institutions take meaningful steps toward protecting their stability from climate-related risks. These guidelines seem to be for institutions already working on these issues and exclude major banks and corporations who have refused to take action.

Please begin immediately to establish a concrete timeline for banks to follow these guidelines; the science shows that we cannot afford any delays in transitioning to a clean energy economy, and many are already feeling the extreme economic impacts of climate change. I would like to see more specifics on how quickly financial institutions need to implement these changes.

The guidelines need to emphasize the importance of managing transition risk by phasing out funding of fossil fuels and investing in sustainable energy projects, with particular attention to ensuring that new infrastructure and technology is accessible and affordable for all - particularly lower-income, frontline, and BIPOC communities.

Dear Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System,

Thank you for finally taking up the issue of climate change's effect on banks. Your attention to this issue is long overdue, as other regulators in the U.S. and abroad have already taken steps to address these risks. I am writing to urge you to quickly finalize these principles and start issuing more detailed expectations about how banks can put them into practice.

I support the proposed guidance's recommendations to banks that they: incorporate climate-related risk management into every level of business; plan for climate change over a long time horizon, and update models as additional data becomes available; develop clear definitions of possible climate-related risk exposures, and metrics for setting limits; make sure that banks' internal strategies are consistent with their public-facing climate commitments; and avoid risk management strategies that disproportionately harm disadvantaged communities.

It is in the best interest of both the public and banks themselves to act now to minimize climate risk. The Fed must use the full extent of its authority to issue strong final guidance to banks on climate risk, continue to protect against unsafe and unsound bank practices, and require remedies from banks where appropriate.

Sincerely,
Sharon Adley

Dear Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System,

Thank you for finally taking up the issue of climate change's effect on banks. Your attention to this issue is long overdue, as other regulators in the U.S. and abroad have already taken steps to address these risks. I am writing to urge you to quickly finalize these principles and start issuing more detailed expectations about how banks can put them into practice.

Even as banks publicly claim to be taking climate change seriously and phasing out financing for greenhouse gas emissions, they are investing billions into risky companies that produce fossil fuels. Banks' continued investments in risky fossil fuel assets help drive climate change—a crisis that puts people of color and low-income communities, our financial system, and the habitability of our planet at risk.

Regulators must not let financial institutions gamble with our future. The Board must act with urgency to ensure banks take the steps necessary to address the dangers they face from climate change, while stopping their short-term business decisions from endangering our economy and communities.

I support the proposed guidance's recommendations to banks that they: incorporate climate-related risk management into every level of business; plan for climate change over a long time horizon, and update models as additional data becomes available; develop clear definitions of possible climate-related risk exposures, and metrics for setting limits; make sure that banks' internal strategies are consistent with their public-facing climate commitments; and avoid risk management strategies that disproportionately harm disadvantaged communities.

In particular, the Board must ensure that banks' actions match their commitments to zeroing out their net carbon emissions. Banks' management of climate risk should be factored into their supervisory ratings, too. The Board must also acknowledge that net zero transition plans at large banks are an important tool for managing climate risk, and that by mitigating climate change, these plans can also have positive effects on community banks that are particularly vulnerable to climate risk.

It is in the best interest of both the public and banks themselves to act now to minimize climate risk. The Fed must use the full extent of its authority to issue strong final guidance to banks on climate risk, continue to protect against unsafe and unsound bank practices, and require remedies from banks where appropriate.

Sincerely,
Richard Sigler

I look forward to seeing large financial institutions take meaningful action to protect these communities.

To ensure financial stability during climate impacts, these guidelines must be requirements, not recommendations.

You must make plans and regulations to ensure all financial institutions take meaningful steps that protect their customers from climate-related risks.

These guidelines seem designed for institutions already working on these issues, and exclude major banks and corporations who have so far refused to take action. How foolish!

These guidelines lack a concrete timeline for banks to implement changes required to protect our common future.

The science shows that we cannot delay transitioning to a clean energy economy. Communities are already feeling extreme economic impacts of climate change.

Please be specific about how quickly financial institutions need to implement these changes, and make them mandatory and universal.

It's now or never.

The guidelines must emphasize the importance of managing transition risk by phasing out funding of fossil fuels and investing in sustainable energy projects, with particular attention to ensuring that new infrastructure and technology is accessible and affordable for all - particularly lower-income, frontline, and BIPOC communities.

I am also concerned that the risk assessment process could cause financial institutions to reduce their investment in the frontline communities hit hardest by the climate crisis. Your comment: Sunday, February 5, 2023 Ann E. Misback Secretary Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System 20th Street and Constitution Avenue NW Washington, DC 20551 Subject: Strengthen climate guidance for banks to protect our community and economy -- Principles for Climate-Related Financial Risk Management for Large Financial Institutions (Document ID: FRS-2022-0338-0001) Dear Federal Reserve Chairman Jerome Powell, Thank you for finally taking up the issue of climate change's effect on banks and for the opportunity to comment. Your attention to this issue is long overdue, as other regulators in the U.S. and abroad have already taken steps to address these risks. I strongly urge the Federal Reserve to: 1) make the draft principles outlined in this proceeding into requirements rather than just recommendations, 2) quickly finalize these principles, and 3) start issuing more detailed expectations about how banks can put them into practice. Banks must play a major role in addressing the climate crisis. Even as banks publicly claim to be taking the climate crisis seriously—touting their climate commitments and claiming they are phasing out financing for greenhouse gas emissions—they are investing billions into risky companies that produce fossil fuels. It's estimated that in 2021 alone the world's 60 largest banks—including four major US-based banks—invested $742 billion in fossil fuel financing. All four of those banks have commitments to achieve net-zero emissions by 2050. Bankrolling climate pollution negatively impacts low-income communities and people of color who are disproportionately affected by the climate crisis; this includes bearing a larger financial burden from climate-related disasters that are becoming more frequent and severe. The truth is we cannot afford fossil fuel expansion. Banks' continued investments in risky fossil fuel assets help drive climate change—a crisis that puts all of us (especially people of color and low-income communities), our financial system, and the habitability of our planet at risk. They cannot continue to make internal decisions in direct opposition to their public messaging. Banks need to create transparent, science-based action plans outlining how they will reduce their emissions to net-zero, with interim milestones to measure their progress. Not only does prolonged investment in fossil fuels negatively affect public health and the environment, but it poses a serious threat to our financial system. In the wake of the United States' historic investment in climate and clean energy, it is vital that banks accurately assess the transitional risk of continued oil and gas investments—over $1 trillion in assets are at risk of becoming stranded if banks do not follow policies to align with the Paris Agreement. I support the proposed guidance's recommendations to banks that they: 1) incorporate climate-related risk management into every level of business; 2) plan for climate change over a long time horizon, and update models as additional data becomes available; 3) develop clear definitions of possible climate-related risk exposures, and metrics for setting limits; 4) make sure that banks' internal strategies are consistent with their public-facing climate commitments; and 5) avoid risk management strategies that disproportionately harm disadvantaged communities. However, in order to protect our financial stability from the climate crisis, the proposed guidelines need to be requirements, not recommendations. They must emphasize the importance of phasing out fossil fuels funding and investing in sustainable energy projects. There are not yet any plans in place to ensure that all financial institutions take meaningful steps toward protecting their stability from climate-related risks. These guidelines seem to be for institutions already working on these issues and exclude major banks and corporations who have refused to take action. Please include provisions to ensure banks can't greenwash their way out of their responsibilities with investments in false solutions. These guidelines also lack a concrete timeline for banks to follow these guidelines. The science shows that we cannot afford any delays in transitioning to a clean energy economy, and many are already feeling the extreme economic impacts of climate change. I would like to see more specifics on how quickly financial institutions need to implement these changes. The Board must ensure that banks back up their net-zero emission commitments with the actions that will actually help them reach those goals—and reach them quickly. The extent to which banks manage climate risk should also be factored into their supervisory ratings. The Board must also acknowledge that net zero transition plans at large banks are an important tool for managing climate risk, and that by mitigating climate change, these plans can also have positive effects on community banks that are particularly vulnerable to climate risk. Smaller regional-based banks will play an important role in mitigating these risks, which is why it's vital to not limit the scope of these principles to only our largest financial institutions. It's critical that your guidance recognizes this burden and the risk imposed on these communities the longer banks delay climate action. I am also concerned that the risk assessment process could cause financial institutions to reduce their investment in the frontline communities hit hardest by the climate crisis. I urge the Federal Reserve to take steps to make sure that these communities are not forgotten, ensuring that climate risk assessments do not lead to divestment from BIPOC communities or any furthering of the inequities of historical redlining by banking and mortgage institutions. The guidelines need to emphasize the importance of managing transition risk by phasing out funding of fossil fuels and investing in sustainable energy projects, with particular attention to ensuring that new infrastructure and technology is accessible and affordable for all—particularly lower-income, frontline, and BIPOC communities. I'm grateful that the Federal Reserve's Principles recognize that low- to medium-income households and frontline communities will be at the highest risk from the physical and financial impacts of the climate crisis, and I am looking forward to seeing large financial institutions take meaningful action on protecting their customers and communities. It is in the best interest of both the public and banks themselves to act now to address the climate crisis, and one way of doing that is by minimizing the climate risk to our economy. The Fed must use the full extent of its authority to issue strong requirements to banks to address their climate risk, including how they contribute to climate change by choosing to prop up the fossil fuel industry over funding real clean energy solutions. Major banks cannot slow-walk addressing the crisis they funded. With the ever-present climate crisis, we are facing an unprecedented threat to every aspect of our economy and our very lives. Regulators must not let financial institutions gamble with our future. I am encouraged by the initial start these proposed climate principles represent, but the Federal Reserve needs to take bolder action to fulfill their mandate of protecting the stability of our financial system. The Federal Reserve needs to move beyond suggestions and recommendations and needs to put firm requirements into place for financial institutions of all sizes with the rapid timelines we need to address the climate crisis. The Board must act with urgency to ensure banks take the steps necessary to address the dangers they face from climate change, while stopping their short-term business decisions from endangering our economy and communities. Please quickly finalize the strongest possible recommendations to account for the serious threat climate risks pose to our financial system, with particular attention to the impact on our most climate-vulnerable communities. Dear Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System,

On behalf of more than 8,000 Americans who want to improve their communities' health and protect the planet we share, The Climate Reality Project strongly urges you to quickly finalize the strongest possible recommendations to account for the serious threat climate risks pose to our financial system, with particular attention to the impact on our most climate-vulnerable communities.

We have attached the comment letter we have asked our followers, friends, and volunteers in the region to sign as well as each signatory's name. As you tabulate the number of comments, we hope you count each and every one of these signatories as an individual comment.

Thank you for your work and commitment to climate action.

Comments for Docket No. OP-1793

Dear Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System,

Banks must play a major role in addressing the climate crisis. Despite touting their climate commitments, major financial institutions continue to fund fossil fuels at the expense of us all, especially our most vulnerable communities. The truth is we cannot afford fossil fuel expansion. We are encouraged by the initial start these proposed climate principles represent and urge you to quickly publish more detailed plans on implementation practices.

It's estimated that in 2021 alone the world's 60 largest banks, including four major US-based banks, invested $742 billion in fossil fuel financing. All four of those banks have commitments to achieve net-zero emissions by 2050. They cannot continue to make internal decisions in direct opposition to their public messaging. Banks need to create transparent, science-based action plans outlining how they will reduce their emissions to net-zero, with interim milestones to measure their progress.

Bankrolling climate pollution negatively impacts low-income communities and people of color who are disproportionately affected by the climate crisis; this includes bearing a larger financial burden from climate-related disasters that are becoming more frequent and severe. Smaller regional-based banks will play an important role in mitigating these risks, which is why it's vital to not limit the scope of these principles to only our largest financial institutions. It's critical that your guidance recognizes this burden and the risk imposed on these communities the longer banks delay climate action.

Not only does prolonged investment in fossil fuels negatively affect public health and the environment, but it poses a serious threat to our financial system. In the wake of the United States' historic investment in climate and clean energy, it is vital that banks accurately assess the transitional risk of continued oil and gas investments — over $1 trillion in assets are at risk of becoming stranded if banks do not follow policies to align with the Paris Agreement.

Major banks cannot slow-walk addressing the crisis they funded. We ask you to quickly finalize the strongest possible recommendations to account for the serious threat climate risks pose to our financial system, with particular attention to the impact on our most climate-vulnerable communities.

Thank you.
